

SUGGESTED READING LIST

In discussing a suggested reading list, when surveyed recently, the faculty at the University of Richmond School of Law generally felt that a “summer reading list” was unnecessary. They felt that a good, well-rounded college education and a good orientation (which we have here) should be sufficient to prepare students for the first day of law school and the study of law.

They felt, however, there was one thing that prospective students could do that would be helpful in preparing for law school. You should read the newspaper every day, with a special eye to the op/eds and the letters to the editor. You should critique the arguments so you become attuned to analyzing both good and poor argumentation. This will sharpen your high-level critical thinking and reading comprehension skills. In addition to the op/ed page, pay attention to how many articles in the paper are relevant to the law. This will help you realize just how much of life the law can touch.

Finally, while we felt the provision of a list is unnecessary, we recognize that simply telling people to relax, that things will be fine, can be seen as a distinctly unhelpful attitude. So, the faculty came up with the following list: six categories of books that we feel are a good, basic introduction to law school and the law school experience.
